Jane Eyre's life is really sad and depressing. It would have all changed, only if Jane was rich and beautiful. For one thing, there would be less bullying and abuse that she would have to endure. She would have more friends, have a better life experience, and from that, have a better self-confidence and love herself more.

Eyre finally achieves her goals by becoming a better person, which was after everything she went through, which was being bullied, homeless, and everybody she ever cared about died. Eventually, she marries the man she's in love with, and they stay together for 10 beautiful years. But, if she was rich and famous like she wanted to be, she would never have met her future husband and most likely, she would never have been grateful for everything she would have had.

She would have most likely grown up with people around who care for her and try their best to protect her from what the everything evil the world has to offer. She might have been a completely different person with a different personality, different mindset, and ways of doing things. Also, she would never have met her lover, Mr. Rochester. Even if she did, because of her different lifestyle, she might not have been in love with him as she would have if she was the way the author depicted her to be. Also, she most likely ended up marrying another, completely different man.

In conclusion, if she was a beautiful and rich women, then the entire plot would have changed. She wouldn't have been bullied, rather she would be respected. She wouldn't have been homeless, rather she would be living in the most luxuries mansions. Also, everybody would love her and she might never meet your husband. She also might have been popular and had everybody in the school as her friend.
